A beautiful volung woman named Margaret Heys was found a corpse in the ours of her husband, her body having been chopped into fragments with a hatchet, and the sickening masthrust into a trap e llar on the premises. Every exertion was made to discover the guilty party. The husband was driven away by grief and suspicion. One year passed, and ano her, without furnishing any clue, and now omes the most wonderful p rt of the tory. It seems almost like fictiontoo strange to be true. It has been nine years since the murder and during all this time the mystery has grown deeper and deeper. The scene, how ever, now changes from the quiet little village of Stewartville to a large and flourishing city in the West-from the little house along the Morris Canal, in New Jersey, to No. 43 Canfield street, Cleveland, Ohio. In this house, upon a certain night, a man named John Conningham is furiously beating his wife; he has her down upon the floor and is about to crush her face with his eel, when in terror, she cries out: Don't, don't, for God's sake ! or yo will murder me as you mardered that
